Builders see light at end of the tunnel in Metronet

August 5, 2019

Builders suffering a prolonged industry slump are hoping the McGowan Government's announcement of the route and station locations for the Morley-Ellenbrook Line is a light at the end of the tunnel.

"The north-eastern suburbs are expected to be one of the country's fastest growing areas, with the population forecast to double in the next decade." Master Builders Housing Director Jason Robertson said.

"The announcement by the McGowan Government will provide welcome and much-needed transport improvements to current and future residents. Importantly, it also signals job creation in due course for the building and construction industry, with a multitude of new residences to accommodate the growing population.

"There has been a lot of hardship in the building industry in recent years and delivering projects such as this increases confidence that prosperous times are returning for our state."
